The invention is primarily directed toward producing a centrifugally cast strip or ductile iron or like cast product, which has substantially improved properties, with respect to strength, ductility, formability and the like over the casting products of the prior art. The method and apparatus of the present invention are especially suitable for the production of centrifugally cast ductile iron strips or the like, which have substantially improved properties with respect to strength, ductility, formability, etc., in accordance with U.S. patent application Ser. No. 08/746,675 filed Nov. 6, 1996. However, the method and apparatus of the invention is not limited to this particular application, and the invention is also suitable for the production of other cast shapes, with improved properties, of for example, hardened metal or steels, or intermetallics. Ductile cast iron consists of ferrite and pearlite, which are present in different proportions and in different phases depending on the composition of the melt, thus depending on the type of metal being cast. In general, the ferrite phase is predominant for carbon levels of more than 0.05%, and the pearlite phase is predominant at carbon levels below 0.05%. The ratio of ferrite to pearlite changes at different temperatures, and with time. These phases are arranged isogravitationally with respect to temperature. In the case of ductile iron, it is necessary to provide a sharp boundary between the ferrite and pearlite phases. This is achieved by the existence of a thermomechanical nucleating process, whereby the beginning of the pearlite formation process is initiated at the boundary between the pearlite and ferrite phases. The use of nucleating agents in molten steel is well known. Examples of nucleating agents used to produce ductile cast iron include metallic carbides such as silicon carbide and chromium carbide, and nonmetallic carbides such as B_4C_3, TiC, TiN, and mixtures of these. Thus, in order to obtain improved properties in the ductile cast iron product, it is important that
